To Scott Santibañez, the call sounded like a routine request in a 22-year career at CDC that has been filled with such calls. It proved to be anything but.

During the first half of 2020, the 3,500-member Hoopa Valley tribe in northern California had managed to stay largely free of COVID-19, with only a few cases. But in August, the numbers began to soar, reaching 40 cases in a few days.
